

What is a blog?

A weblog is a web-log, or a log (journal) on the web. In its various adaptations, it represents the thoughts of a group or individual. Unlike a website that has more “static” or informational purposes, the blog is about being in conversation, and creating community.

Why should I blog?

- You can reach everyone (potentially) on the internet.
- People get to know you outside of the more formal way you normally communicate.
- Conversation carries past the doors of your ministry into the world.
- Blogging allows your members/constituents to share your thoughts with others thanks to social media
- Blogging allows people considering your ministry to see what you’re all about before they ever show up.
- You can reach people who may never set foot inside the doors of your ministry.
- You can respond immediately to issues you read about, experience, or hear about.
- You can think about, edit, revise, and come back to thoughts you have over time that may change.

What should I blog about?

- What you know. Your writing should be “of you,” honest, and transparent.
- What you want people you care about to read. If you don’t want to see that thought or story in writing five years from now, don’t put it out there.
- What you’re passionate about. When you care, other people will care, too.
- The way you interact with a text, an experience, a situation, a work of art.
- How your story fits within the Story of God’s work in the world.

What are some standards for blogging?

- Set a goal for yourself that you can reach, and blog regularly.
- Have someone else proofread your work.
- Share your blog through social media like Facebook, Twitter, etc.
- Use simple titles to drive readership.
- Read other blogs and comment on them, potentially driving up your own readership.
- Be careful how much you assume someone else knows about the subject.
- Consider whether your use of some other material is necessary or crossing over into plagiarism.
- Don’t be afraid to use videos. Some people even blog in video form only.
- Establish a standard for responding to comments, whether it’s 24 hours or immediately, and stick to it.
- Determine the best comment policy for you: does every comment get approved or do you have a standard (nothing profane, derogatory, etc.?)
- Respond to every comment you allow to show; your non-response exhibits that you don’t care (even if you do).

Where do I start?

- Pick a name for your blog that is unique and fits you.
- Create a user entry for Wordpress.org (it's free and reasonably easy to use.)
- Using Wordpress, choose the background theme you like best for your blog (you can change it later).
- Describe yourself and your blog through the contact information.
- Write your first post. And potentially delete all of it and start over again. And keep writing!
- Your posts will “archive” so that if someone sees your latest post and appreciates it, they can go back and look at earlier posts.
- Readers who appreciate your posts will be able to “subscribe” to your blog and get updates when you post.
- Or, try Tumblr and BlogSpot as other free blogging options. Tumblr will automatically post to Facebook and Twitter, and allow you follow other Tumblr accounts but you cannot export Tumblr posts.

---

Contributors:

Jason Micheli, TamedCynic.org

Jacob Sahms, HollywoodJesus.com, mustardseedthoughts.wordpress.com

Jason Stanley, jasoncstanley.com